More About Trust in Education

TIE has eight computer libraries utilized by an average of 720 girls a day, six days a week. For girls beyond the sixth grade, this may well be their only access to an education outside their home. The Taliban are currently not educating girls beyond the sixth grade. The libraries also enable the girls to get out of the house, meet and socialize. Many are not allowed and are afraid to leave their home. That may explain why the libraries' absentee rate is only 14 a day out of the 720.

Last November, TIE learned Afghan families were selling their young daughters to support other members of the family. TIE immediately established a family support program. Sixty-six Afghan families are currently receiving financial support from families in the United States. The families receive $100 per month for a year, enough to feed a family of four. This is a zero sum program for TIE. One hundred percent of contributions go to the sponsored families. We have enough unrestricted donations to make this possible.
